Course Description
The course explores a number of different perspectives with regards to how culture is constructed, negotiated and consumed. What (un)truths can we find in various expressions of (popular) culture? And, how may this affect public institutions, political decision-making and scientific production in contemporary society?

The empirical and theoretical approaches of the course are inter-disciplinary and problem-oriented. Some of the problems highlighted during the course are 1) Cultural Heritage and the negotiation of identity politics 2) The possible decline of scientific knowledge in public discourse 3) The changing role of cultural production in post-industrial society.

The course is aimed at those interested in notions of knowledge and truth and how this can be studied from a cultural studies perspective. All those coming from a humanities or social science background will be familiar with the inter-disciplinary approaches of the field of cultural studies. The course consists of three different forms of teaching; lectures, seminars and fieldtrips.
Course Aims
After completing the course the student should be able to:

- Account for different theoretical conceptions of culture.
- Problematize contemporary conditions and challenges for the production of knowledge.
